

Take me home

These portraits are of people and the dogs that they adopted from shelters and the streets of Georgia. The laws and regulations on the matter of animal rights are still developing in Georgia, therefore many animals are abused, abandoned, killed daily. Every day I witnessed how people tried to save them, many started to adopt street dogs, despite of their breed, just simply because they loved them and felt that they are vulnerable and cannot help themselves. I tried to help as much as I could, and then decided to start making portraits of people who adopted dogs. on the other hand I photograph animals in streets to show what kind of impact living with humans have on dogs and on their owners too .I think how we treat animals, tells a lot about us. I also think that children growing up with a dog develop qualities which later will lead them to be better humans, who are ready to help others. With my photography portraits I want to contribute and promote animal adopting. I often say if everybody will adopt one dog, maybe on day there will be no street dogs at all.
